Jai prakash Narayan: Political Thought, Social Philosophy and Contribution to Indian Democracy

Abstract

Jai Prakash Narayan was a great social thinker and political leader who had ushered in an era of great socio-political revolutions, when the country was grappling with the major issues of poverty, unemployment, corruption, insecurity, homelessness, dictatorship, inequality and injustice. His thoughts and movements caught the eye not only in India, but also throughout the world. Due to his extraordinary role in social and political change his name became popular in the context of "Loknayak". Jayprakash went through his education in American Universities, and was greatly influenced by Marxism. He returned to India and joined the Indian National Congress, where he was actively engaged in the struggle for independence from the British rule in India. Following the Independence movement, over time Narayan was gradually away from party involvement and dedicated his life to social reconstruction and building an Anti-Congress platform in 1948. J. established the Praja Socialist Party. J. launched the Praja Socialist Party. In 1952, P gave voice to the disenfranchised, established a political alternative. He did his utmost to introduce Sarvodaya Movement of Acharya Vinoba Bhave. Jayprakash was actively associated with Sarvodaya Movement started by Gandhiji and led by Vinoba Bhave. The Sarvodaya of J. In the fifties P mentioned a new order which would try to create a classless stateless society to fruit people's socialism. He was greatly distressed with the increasing corruption in India's political arena. He initially became the "Jeevan Danee" of Jeevandan movement led by Vinoba Bhave. To counteract the dominant party politics he introduced the idea of partyless and communitarian democracy to develop democratic culture and values. Sampurna Kranti or total revolution was the final intellectual contribution of Jayprakash in his endless pursuit to establish a socio-economic and political order in India, which would make India a democratic and prosperous nation in the world. In the present study emphasis would be given to the social and political contribution made by JP in reconstructing the Indian society through all his moving up till his death. He was dedicated to purify political, socio-economic and moral part of the people.

Introduction

Jay Prakash Narayan was one of the most dedicated leaders in India. He pursued higher education in universities in the United States, where he gradually developed a strong interest in Marxist ideas. After returning to India, he joined Indian National Congress, He influenced by Jawaharlal Nehru's appeal to participate in the struggle to end British colonial rule. He was influenced by Mahatma Gandhi as well as Bal Gangadhar Tilak. Gandhi's philosophy of non-violence further encouraged JP to adopt a simple way of life and dedicate himself to the service of the nation. At the age of eighteen, Jayprakash Narayan married with Prabhavati Devi. His marriage also brought him into new contact with several prominent political leader through his father-in-law, who was connected with the national movement. During freedom struggle time, JP was arrested and imprisoned on several occasions because of his active participation in the anti-British movement.

Jayprakash Narayan later emerged as one of the important leaders of Indian socialism and played a significant role in shaping socialist thought in the country. From the 1930s to the mid-1950s, he remained actively involved in socialist politics and worked for social and economic equality. Throughout his life, his main concern was the creation of a democratic society based on justice, freedom, equality, and human dignity. His ideas about politics and society were based on the principle that everyone should have the freedom to live independently and receive the same opportunities in life.

OBJECTIVE OF THE STUDY

- To examine the life and political career of Jayaprakash Narayan..
- To examine his contribution to the Indian freedom movement.
- To analyse his transition from socialism to Sarvodaya.
- To examine his concept of partyless democracy and decentralisation.
- To study the philosophical and political significance of Total Revolution.

Methodology

This study is primarily historical and analytical in nature. It is based on secondary sources, including books, scholarly articles, government publications, academic studies and selected writings of Jayaprakash Narayan. The research follows a qualitative methodology. Historical and political developments have been examined chronologically and thematically to understand the evolution of Narayan's political philosophy. Particular attention has been given to his writings on socialism, democracy and Sarvodaya and to scholarly interpretations of the Total Revolution movement. The study uses secondary materials to collect data of Jayaprakash Narayan's published writings, including Socialism, Sarvodaya, and Democracy.

Jayaprakash Narayan's Revolutionary Contribution

After completing his higher studies in the USA, JP returned to India and became a member of the Indian National Congress to fight against the British Government in 1929. From this time, JP started taking an active part in Indian Freedom Struggle up to achieving Indian Independence. He was put into prison in 1932 for participating actively in the Civil Disobedience Movement organized by Gandhiji against the oppressive British Rule. He made friends with leaders like Ashok Mehta, Minu Mashani, Ram Manohar Lohia, C. K. Narayan Swami, etc. during his imprisonment at the Nasik Jail in 1932. This friendship made JP join the Congress Socialist Party (CSP). ¹As the General Secretary of (CSP), he asked the Nation to utilize the Second World War opportunity to free themselves from the British Rule and exploitation. He was again imprisoned for 9 months. On release from Jail, he tried hard to achieve a reconciliation between Gandhiji and Subhas Chandra Bose about the Movement's policy but failed to do that. ²He was arrested by the British Government on the charge of participating in the Quit India Movement of August 1942. He was charged with the ongoing stir with other freedom fighters and was put in Hazaribagh Central Jail. He succeeded in escaping from jail on the Diwali day in November 1942 when most of the guards of the Jail were on leave. ³This daring escape of JP made him a folk hero. During the freedom struggle period, JP worked actively as an underground freedom fighter. In order to stop the exploitation of the British Government, he organized an 'Azad Dasta' (Freedom Brigade) in Nepal. After some months, he was arrested again and again from Punjab while traveling through train in September 1943. He was brutally tortured by the British Police for information related to the Freedom Struggle. When Gandhi insisted that he would initiate negotiations with the British Government only after the unconditional release of Ram Manohar Lohia and JP in April 1946. He was a born freedom fighter of corruption, injustice, and exploitation of the poor section of the society. Hence he made great efforts to bring about socio-economic changes for establishing a truly equal society with justice up to his death.⁴

Jayaprakash Narayan's Influence on Indian Socialist Thought

For almost 24 years JP worked as socialist from 1930 to 1954. Gandhiji regarded him to be the greatest authority on Socialism in India. He made lots of active contributions to the popularization of the Congress Socialist Party and its program. He felt that without socialism, inequalities, corruption and exploitation cannot be curbed. The formation of the Congress Socialist Party (CSP) in May 1934 was a significant milestone in the development of the Socialist movement in India. The blueprints of CSP were drawn in Nasik Jail where JP, Ashoke Mehata, Minoo Masani, Lohia were imprisoned together. Slowly with the passage of time, JP acted as the most active leader of the Congress Socialist Party and also as the most re-organized personality in the domain of Indian Socialism.⁵ JP had great emphasis on the economic issues of the nation and necessity of the solution of these problems as early as possible with socialistic principles. According to him 'the root cause of inequalities of wealth lies in the fact that the gifts of nature which provide wealth to man and the instruments of productions have come to be privately owned by individuals for their own benefits. This resulted in economic exploitation.'⁶ JP felt that inequalities developed due to the private ownership of means of production and that led to concentration of wealth and exploitation of others. It was because he supported the abolition of private wealth and private ownership. JP thought that banks, industries, transport and trade should be nationalized as the property of the State. He laid stress on the fact that the State has to fulfill the needs of the people to create a socialistic and truly democratic state with the spirit of justice, equality and liberty. Democracy cannot flourish without the establishment of socialism in the Indian polity. JP had complete knowledge about the flaws of representative, parliamentary democracy. He said that socialism is nothing but the equal sharing of the benefits of state wealth by all.⁷ Being a socialist, JP had deep empathy towards the peasants who were suffering in so many ways. He tried to bring a radical change in the society in such a way that there would be reduction in the suffering of the peasants in the villages. He wished that the village should be self-sufficient and there should be radical changes in the laws regarding the land. He suggested the formation of cooperative firms.⁸ He implemented socialism in the Indian political environment through Gandhian methods of non-violence and Satyagraha. JP did not prefer Marxist methods of class struggle for his socialistic struggle. JP's idea of Socialism according to him was, "I would like to define a socialist society as one in which the individual is prepared voluntarily to subordinate his interest to the larger interest of the society. The keyword in this definition is 'Voluntarily'. In his book 'Why Socialism' (1936), JP gave profound importance to economic equality and suggested the abolition of private property as a solution for equality. He accused private property as the root cause of inequality. JP had a clear vision of other methods to solve the problem of inequality such as equal opportunity for self-development, not equitable apportionment of national wealth and social, educational and services between all. Being a follower of Marxist ideology, JP wanted the abolition of private property to solve the problem of inequality. But as a democratic socialist, JP understood that equality also has social and political dimension as well; it needed different policies to cope with them.⁹

Jayaprakash Narayan's Influence on the Sarvodaya Movement:

Sarvodaya is a social restructuring movement through which Jay Prakash Narayan has tried to establish social justice and welfare of all. In this society, all human beings without based on caste, creed, religion, gender, race, and sex will get equal opportunity. No party power politics is in Sarvodaya society. Lokniti will take the place of politics in this society where all people will take part in the decision-making process. Love, compassion, and sympathy are the mottos of Sarvodaya society. Sarvodaya society believes in liberty, equality, and fraternity with abolishing corruption, unemployment, nepotism, and mal practice. In this regard, JP has proposed some constitutional amendments. The political life of JP developed through the way of Marxian socialism. In the Post- Independence Era of India, JP dissociated himself from politics and power politics. Jayaprakash totally divorced himself from Marxism and adopted the philosophy of Sarvodaya. He tried to reinterpret the problem of individual behavior that he was to manifest in politics from an ethical angle. In 1954, he declared at the annual Sarvodaya Conference at Bodhgaya that he would devote his time and energy to promote Sarvodaya movement and its philosophy. He became the first 'Jeevandaneer' on the account of the rise of all. He associated himself with the Bhoodan movement of Acharya Vinobha Bhave to rebuild the socioeconomic status of India. He started establishing the principles and ideals of socialism through his social works. JP advocated the adoption of People's Socialism in place of state socialism. Sarvodaya opposed Rajniti or power politics and adopted Lok Satta or Lokniti. Sarvodaya movement advocated party less democracy to control the power centered party politics. Through the Sarvodaya Programs, JP wished to establish community-centered panchayats through a participative approach of the people. As a Sarvodaya activist, the people have to work in a cooperative spirit to promote the happiness and progress of all.¹⁰ Sarvodaya does not hold the view that different social interests gave rise to different parties. This movement employed the technique of Ahimsa, truth, and Satyagraha instead of Marxist violent approach. By discarding power politics, JP envisaged an ideal social order which was not a paradise for corrupt politicians, bureaucrats and capitalists but there was to be self-government, self-management, cooperation, equality, freedom and brotherhood in the society.¹¹ For leading an ideal and moral life, the discipline of physical needs is imperative for the healthy development of human personality. The socialist way of life is the process of sharing the good through the collective efforts of people. Unless the members of society learn to keep their desires under control, voluntary sharing may be difficult to practice in society. As per JP, the solution would be that every member of the social practices self-discipline and values of socialism. Sarvodaya is the approach towards implementing the values of socialism in the society through the process of voluntarily sharing and cooperation for others.¹²

JP's concept of Total Revolution:

The very term "Total Revolution" (comprehensive revolution) makes it clear that its objective is the creation of the "Total Man." "Total Revolution," which was his term for a comprehensive social revolution including all aspects of life – social, economic, political, cultural, ideological, educational, and moral. He announced this goal for the first time at a mammoth public meeting held in Patna on 5 June 1974, and it immediately caught on. J.P. also explained that the work for Total Revolution has four aspects: struggle, construction, propaganda, and organization. (ibid). This perspective presents a holistic and comprehensive vision of social change. The idea of total revolution is therefore of profound importance for social reconstruction, as it demonstrates how the foundations of multi-dimensional social transformation can be laid through comprehensive leadership., he made it clear that this revolution was not only for the students but it involved the resignation of ministers and the dissolution of the assembly in Bihar. This revolution was also initiated to solve the urgent problems of the nation and ushering in a new era to establish an idealistic socialist state with democratic values to end economic exploitation and social evil. The concept of total revolution of JP was his most important objective to establish a socialistic culture in India for its people. The main motive of this revolution was an active response to the then corrupted socio-economic and political scenario of the country. Total revolution was the combination of seven revolutions like social, political, economic, cultural, educational, ideological and spiritual to bring a change in the Indian society.¹³ This innovative concept of revolution was launched by JP with two main aims, firstly it is to bring a drastic change in all spheres of the society through the means of non-violence and awareness among public. The second was to challenge the arbitrary use of powers by the ruling party in India. He felt that there was an emergency need to protest against the misuse of power, corruption and socio-economic justice of the people. There were many important features of JP's concept of total revolution that can bring a change in the system and mentality of the people. The first feature was about the process of revolution that was based on non-violence and truth. He informed Gandhiji that there was no need for violent methods to change the society of India.¹⁴ The second feature of total revolution was the revolution would aim at sustaining the democratic structure of the nation. Thirdly, JP for his revolution was a change in the individual and social structure of society. Fourthly, the total revolution and it would continuously change our individual and social structure of life. He stated 'Total revolution was always going on and onthis knows no respite, no halt and certainly not a complete halt...¹⁵ Fifthly, he gave the leadership of the revolution to the students. In his opinion, students were more successful in leadership because they had no thirst for power and survival struggle. Sixthly, the idea of class struggle was not intended to obtain the same degree of power. One more feature of total revolution is that JP wanted to introduce a new political system which would be based on mutual respect, trust, and cooperation for everyone. According to Bimal Prasad, JP's concept of the total revolution was a synthesis of Marxist and Gandhian concept of idealistic humanism with the principles of Western Democracy.¹⁶ The main reason for JP's love to socialism was that socialism was based on equality and social justice. However, the requirement for social justice could not be separated from the necessity for the moral development of people. Material success alone could not make possible the realization of social and economic justice. His total revolution aimed at introducing a new attitude and new system in order to achieve the progress in socioeconomic structure of the country. In order to establish an equal society the aim of the total revolution was Sarvodaya, and the method of total revolution. Consequently, we can state that total revolution was the reform of Sarvodaya movement in order to realize the democratic values in the Indian Society.¹⁷

CONCLUSION

Loknayak dedicated himself to set up an egalitarian society based on liberty, equality, and fraternity with Sarvodaya principles. He tried his best to establish a society where all should be treated as equal irrespective of caste, creed, and religion and sexes, and others. His Sarvodaya movement followed the truth and non-violence which teaches universal love and progress for all. JP was working as a socialist from 1932 to 1954. He was a premier leader and spokesperson of Indian socialism. He adopted the philosophy of socialism mixing with Gandhian Socialism for the Indian perspective. He developed his political philosophy by making adjustments to the needs of the Indian polity. Theory of Democratic Socialism adopted by JP was different from Western Political Thinkers. He was the torch bearer of Gandhiji's concepts of peace, non-violence and Gram Swaraj. JP was a strong critic of the shortcomings of parliamentary democracy in India. He tried his level best to establish a communitarian democracy that was becoming more and more decentralized so that people could involve themselves more and more in administration for their development. By adopting the principles of communitarian democracy, JP tried to reconstruct the nation through elimination of power centric party politics in the government. He understood the problems created by the power centric party politics very seriously in order to snatch away the rights of the people. Total Revolution adopted by JP was a permanent revolution. It was going to keep on transforming both the personal and social life of the Indian Polity. JP explains the transformation of people and society by the means of total revolution against all sorts of corruption. During the Post-Independence Phase, his political philosophy brought a moral fabric, peoplecentric political culture and a ray of hope to establish peoplecentric democratic government. His Non-Congress Leadership after independence was a devoted work for the country to reconstruct the nation through establishment of real democratic values and attitudes in order to protect the interest of the people. After the independence of India, JP was the only one 'Crusader' to launch total revolution in the country without any motive of power. It was total revolution and not a revolution to be done once, but was to be continued permanently to create a change in the mindset as well as in the socio-economic conditions of the country. The total revolution of JP aimed at bringing about basic changes in the social, cultural, political and economic values of Indians. He used the word 'total' to mean a revolution which is comprehensive in nature covering all aspects of society. The greatest contribution of JP in Indian politics was the JP Movement that he organized against Mrs Gandhi which resulted in Emergency being imposed. The first Non-Congress party to form the government of the Centre through Janata Party he should get credit for ending the domination of Congress Party in Post-Independence India. According to JP, Total Revolution is not respite, not halt, not complete halt. JP has written several books and articles on the Reconstruction of the Indian Polity. He has been honoured with the Magsaysay Award for public services in 1965 and was awarded posthumously the prestigious award Bharat Ratna in 1999 for the contribution of Social and Political leadership in India. JP never wanted power, position or fame for himself. This unselfish leader worked tirelessly to build the ideal India where there would be equality, freedom and justice for all.
